Seventeenth-century Londoners wore LAVENDER around their wrists in the belief that it would protect them from the Great Plague. As it turns out, this may have helped. Lavender repels fleas, which spread the plague.